

Products crafted in Alaska by Alaskans are recognized with the “Made in Alaska” logo. The image of an adult polar bear sow and her cub indicates the item was crafted, manufactured or produced by an Alaska resident. Made in Alaska products must be produced using local materials, unless the manufacturer or artist offers documentation that the raw materials found instate are either insufficient in quantity or quality for mass production.

In order to receive the Made in Alaska emblem on their product, artists and manufacturers must submit an application and go through a permitting process. Since the permits are only good for one year, the consumer can make a purchase with confidence that the product’s quality and authenticity are consistent with Made in Alaska standards.

Made in Alaska goods include everything from artwork and clothes to food, agriculture, construction and educational materials.

Products associated with Made in Alaska can be found in local stores, but there are also a variety of festivals and markets where these Alaska creations can be purchased. In many cases, the artists themselves sell their items providing a great opportunity to meet the maker.

Below is a list of festivals and retailers where Made in Alaska items are available for purchase.
